America at the Still Point, by Dave Masko. Thanks to Donald Trump's executive order, all Internet privacy and health safeguards have been removed so that Silicon Valley rules over users. Trump signed this measure that "totally undermines safety for our privacy and physical safety," says a longtime information technology professional sharing views for this special "new journalism" report with essays that expose tech's dirty underbelly. While the Obama administration kept privacy protections in place to stop Internet service providers from both selling personal user data and exposing users to harmful EMF effects, Trump and the Republican controlled Congress approved legislation that removes all privacy rules and EMF health warnings. Trump's odious act to boost Silicon Valley's "Secret State" mind control over users means Internet service providers no longer need consent before they sell or share private user web browsing history and lots of other sensitive information such as smartphones and laptops emit toxic EMFs that cause brain and other cancers in users. While Trump likes to use "presidential optics" per the appearance of work as this madman "fake president" signs executive order after order without properly researching the impact of such things as removing protections against user data mining and exposure to EMFs online. The same is true when Trump revoked hundreds of other federal government guidelines that "specifically protect the citizen from corporate user data mining online; while removing EMF frequency danger data from the sale of smartphones and other digital devices that are known to cause cancer in users. This collection of "new journalism" essays thus becomes a reflection on what is, and what should never be in terms of an unregulated information technology industry that is now free to mine all personal data online; while also destroying young minds hooked into machine via exposure to brain cancer causing EMFs. Thus, the goal of this collection of new journalism essays is to explain why it's worth unplugging from screens part of the day because the all-powerful information technology industry has planted "brain bugs" that need scratching that leads to digital drug addiction, post-human behavior and the likelihood of contracting brain or other cancers over time as a regular tech user, say medical and psychology experts.
